Based on Springboard: Launching Your Personal Search for Success

As you think about you family as both a source of both conflict and strength, it may help to contemplate the positive influences that have shaped your life and provided you with the foundations for whatever success you will achieve. To do this, we turn to the private diary of the Roman Emperor Marcus Aurelius as a source of inspiration. He titled his diary To Myself. It was a journal he kept between 170 and 180 A.D. while he was fighting against barbarian tribes along the northern borders of the Roman Empire. After the fall of Rome, the diary was lost for more than one thousand years, but was rediscovered and published in Zurich in 1558. It is now known as The Meditations and is considered a masterpiece of Stoic philosophy.

On the day Marcus Aurelius sat down in his tent near the Danube River to make his first notes about what was important in his life and how best to live it, he began by listing what he had learned from the people who cared most about him. The Meditations thus begins: "From my grandfather Verus, I learned good morals and the government of my temper." He goes on to thank his biological father (who died when he was three) for leaving a reputation for "modesty and manly character," and his adoptive father for teaching him "mildness of temper . . . , how to resist "vanity for public honors," and "a love of labor and perseverance." From his mother, he took his taste for "simplicity in my way of living, far removed from the habits of the rich."

To get you started, here are some possible legacies from four areas of your life that you might want to consider. You should, of course, add your own life categories. If you like, write a short paragraph about the most important people in your life to help you remember their legacies to you.

Start with your family members, but feel free to radiate out to other important people who have influenced you – coaches, teachers, mentors, etc. Most researchers agree that your social and cultural environment outside the family can influence you as much or more than the one inside a home.
